Cohen's Making a New Deal argues that the debilitating effects of the Great Depression on ethnic institutions (stores, churches, associations, etc.) led workers to identify as a "working class" rather than their ethnic identity (*Gugliermo!) and thus were able to more successfully unionize and agitate the state for improved working conditions. "Mass culture and mass consumption in the 1920s had kept workers tied to, rather than unmooring them from, their ethnic and working-class ...

In 1919, four million workers launched the greatest strike wave in American history. Boston policemen, New England telephone operators, textile workers up and down the East Coast, most of the workingmen and women in Seattle, 450,000 coal miners, and 365,000 steelworkers nationwide led an offensive in which more than one in five American workers eventually participated.

Making a New Deal: Industrial Workers in Chicago, 1919-1939

Lizabeth Cohen has attempted nothing less than a major reinterpretation of how industrial workers became deeply involved with the union organizing drives of the 1930s. Rather than focusing on external stimuli such as governmental actions, Cohen explores in great detail the ways in which changes in working people's own attitudes allowed them to be participants in, indeed makers of, their New Deal.
